Along the Concrete

SOOT AND DUST
RAISE HEAT BILLSDirt in the Heating Plant
Blamed for Fuel Waste.

There is a tremendous waste of coal and fuel oil during the heating season, due to the fact that home owners do not keep their heating systems clean. Many heating plants are literally choked with soot and dust, and according to the Holland Institute of Plumbing, of Portland, Me., this dirty condition is responsible for an unsatisfactory functioning of the heating system and consequent waste.

In substantiation of the foregoing, the Institute quotes from a report by the United States Bureau of Standards to the effect that even a thin coat of soot, one-eighth inch, cuts down a plant's efficiency 24 per cent, and a quarter inch of soot will result in a 48 per cent cut in operating efficiency.

This explains why difficulty was experienced by some home owners in keeping their homes warm in "last winter's cold weather. The soot and dirt in the heating system interfered with delivery of heat when it was most needed.

There is only one remedy for a condition of this sort, and that is to nullify the heating system, including the chimney, to a thorough cleaning before the next heating season starts.

When soot and dirt are cleaned out, draft troubles may be eliminated, combustion is more thorough, more heat is extracted from the fuel burned, and the home is more satisfactorily heated at less expense.

Formerly this was a dirty, messy job. Now it is accomplished as easily as the vacuum cleaning of the interior of the house and much the same way.

Cleaning of heating plants is now done by means of a giant vacuum cleaner that comes to the job mounted on a motor truck. The cleaner is attached to vent-up openings in the heating plant including the chimney, and the powerful suction of the fan draws out the dirt and soot, forcing it into the bag for later disposal.

The cost of a job of this sort is less than the price of a ton of coal, though many times that will be saved in the course of a year in eliminating fuel waste and cleaning expenses.

Why Not
Little Helen was sitting on Uncle Charlie's lap. He had been entertaining her, as uncles sometimes do, by drawing pictures for her.

"Now, Uncle Charlie, draw me a dish of mashed potatoes."

"Child," he laughed, "I can't draw that."

Helen looked quickly up at him, saying: "I don't see why. You know what they are. You have eaten them at our house, haven't you?"

Beethoven Died Poor
How many people know that Beethoven actually died $100 in debt to the Philharmonic society, who had sent him the money on his obituary, in the hope that they would be able to play his Tenth symphony? He acknowledged the advance by telling them that his new symphony was lying in his desk "completely sketched."

But the work was never destined to be finished. It was only eight days later that Beethoven died.

Temperature Variations
It is a fact that the sun is nearer the earth in winter than in summer in the northern hemisphere, but the difference between the summer and winter temperatures at a given place does not depend upon this fact, as may be seen from the fact that while it is winter in the northern hemisphere it is summer in the southern. The difference of temperatures is due to the different angles at which the sun's rays strike the earth's surface at the same time in summer and in winter.

SOUTH WATERFORD

Love at Asher's

By JANE OSBORN

(Copyright.)

IT WAS a whim of old John Asher, the founder and director of the large group of industries known to those who worked therein simply as Asher's, to interview personally every applicant for a position at the executive department where he had his office. Even an office boy he would see in his private office before he was finally taken on, and to the stenographers and typists whom he treated as mere automatons after employing them, he talked for a quarter of an hour before employing. He had an idea that the motive that drew most young women into business offices was the thought that they might thereby secure for themselves a husband.

"I don't think I'd ever have a girl in the office," he told Jane Kirk the day he considered her as a possible stenographer to take dictation from some of his subordinates, "only I can get 'em cheaper. But I don't want any foolishness—ogling and sniggering around here, thank you. There never have been any matches made here and I guess there won't be. It would be mighty hard for the man that ever started courting one of the girls in here. I want you to understand that before you start."

Jane Kirk flushed with something very near to rage. She would have liked telling the crude old man to get his job and his advice. But she really needed the work and jobs were not too easy to find. So she set her lips tight, told Mr. Asher that she thought she understood, and was tired.

That, by way of preliminary. It explains the dogged determination that possessed Jane Kirk never to become personally interested in or acquainted with any of the men she associated with at the office.

Jane Kirk took dictation for three or four of the executives of the concern, among them Walter Lewis. From the first Jane Kirk, usually the least susceptible of girls, was strongly attracted by his smile. After an hour of dictation with him she always knew how many times he had smiled and just what had occasioned each smile. It seemed to her as if it would be a great diversion to make him smile as much and as often as one could, quite regardless of business, quite regardless, too, of the insinuations of that crude old John Asher who had founded the business and ran it in his domineering way.

But because of what old John Asher had said, Jane never did try to make Walter Lewis smile; instead she tried to see how seldom she need smile at him or speak to him in any but the most businesslike manner. That would show that John Asher, meantime the old man perhaps saw more than she knew.

Weeks passed, and inevitable hours that must be spent between Jane Kirk and Walter Lewis; the endless series of business letters. For hours a day Jane had to sit beside him, listening, talking endlessly about "esteemed favors," "recent interviews," "lowest possible figures," and so on. There was never a personal word between them, and now very rarely a smile. Frequently Jane all but determined not to endure another day of it. It seemed as if she would not be able to do it.

Then from the letters dictated to her she learned that John Asher was opening a new plant in Bradtown, a very new industrial community. It was a thousand miles distant from the central office of Asher's, yet it was to be one of their largest organizations with a considerable office staff. Some difficulty, Jane gathered from the letters, had been encountered in getting people of the office workers' class to work there. Bradtown apparently was a desolate spot on the map indeed.

But it seemed to Jane as if it would be easier to work there than here where she had those endless hours with Walter Lewis. So she went into John Asher's private office one day and asked to be transferred. It was really remarkable the way he took the suggestion. He even called Jane "the girl" as he gave his consent and assured her that the company would pay her traveling expenses and hinted at a "raise." "I shall spend much time there myself," said the old man with a smile.

Two weeks later she started work at Bradtown. A stenographer already established greeted her with some thing like enthusiasm, and asked her to go into the office of the "new manager." Jane looked at the door of the office pointed out and then entered. That was Walter Lewis.

Explanations, excuses and confessions followed. Walter knew the other was coming. Walter shamelessly admitted that he left so as to be away from Jane. Old Asher had made it so plain that there was never to be any romance in the office. "And I couldn't stand it. Besides Mr. Asher couldn't put it that he has his eye on you himself." Of course, Walter Lewis thought that Jane was quite in the right. That seemed so obvious from her own manner to him, and then Jane explained that she had been warned against any friendliness to fellow employees.

"And all the time we were loving each other without daring to say so," said Walter. "And the funny thing is that old John Asher was so blind that he never thought a romance might follow if he sent us both out here."

Freedom's Torch That

Jefferson Lifted High

Among the many provisions contained in the Magna Charta, the chief are: 1. The Church of England to have free rights and liberties. 2. Common pleas shall not follow the king, but shall be held in a fixed place. 3. Assizes to be held locally four times each year. 4. Fines shall not be excessive. 5. Local courts not to be ousted unreasonably of their jurisdiction. 6. Restrictions against long imprisonment without trial. 7. A bailiff shall not bring a man to trial unless he can produce credible witnesses in support of the prosecution. 8. No person shall be punished except after judgment by his equals or according to the law. 9. Justice not to be sold, denied or betrayed. 10. Freedom of entering and leaving the realm except during the time of war. 11. Justices to be learned in the law. 12. No taxation except the three feudal aids already established shall be taken unless with the consent of the Commune Concilium. Magna Charta, originally the Great Charter of the liberties of England, was signed and sealed by King John at the demand of his barons, at Runnymede, June 15, 1215. It was several times confirmed by his successors.

Rattler Has No Chance

With Little MongOOSE

What is perhaps the best-known enemy of poisonous snakes is that furry, weasel-like creature, the mongoose. It is really an ichneumon, and there are several varieties, one found in the south of Spain, another in Egypt, and a third in India. It is easily tamed and will live in temperate as well as in hot climates. It kills and eats cobras, karatis and all kinds of snakes, and has lately been imported into the United States. In the Southwest rattlesnakes often take refuge in old gold and silver mines, and are a great danger to miners. It is now usual, when an old mine is to be reopened, first to let down a mongoose or two into the shaft and leave them there for a couple of days before the men go down. By that time any rattlesnakes which happened to be in the depths have been killed and eaten.

Alphabet's History

The English alphabet came directly from the Latin. The Romans borrowed it from the Greeks; the Greeks from the Phoenicians. It is not known whence the Phoenicians obtained their alphabet. It has been suggested that the 22 characters were adopted from the hieroglyphics of Egypt, the Egyptian characters of Babylon or the symbols used by the Hittites or Cretans. A theory widely accepted today is that the Phoenicians, being great traders, and therefore familiar with the various systems of writing, used by the nations dwelling around the Mediterranean, chose from them such symbols as they needed and thus compiled their own alphabet.

Nova Scotia in Scotland

There is, it is said, a small area on Edinburgh castle near the entrance of the castle that is legally Nova Scotia under a law that has never been repealed, as told by H. V. Morton in his "In Search of Scotland." The explanation is that during the reign of Charles I this small area was declared Nova Scotia territory in order that newly made Nova Scotian baronets might "take seizure" of their lands without crossing the Atlantic to do so. It is an interesting fact, therefore, that this piece of wall and pavement in the heart of Edinburgh is legally in Canada.

Principle Long Accepted

Gresham's law is a principle in finance and political economy, formulated about the middle of the sixteenth century by Sir Thomas Gresham, founder of the London Royal Exchange. The principle is: "Bad money drives out good money from circulation. The good coin (full weight and standard in purity) will be hoarded and the worn and light, or light, coins will be used. Good money will also be used for export to other countries, where it will obtain more in exchange, while the light coins will be used at home, thus depreciating the national currency."

The Easiest Way

Too many people are absolutely indifferent to work. They take no interest in doing it exactly right, in doing it quickly, or getting it out on time. Life to them is just one long drawn-out dream of "getting by" in the easiest way, and with as little exertion as possible, of either mind or body. Their idea seems to be "To let George do it." Again, there are others, splendid examples of those who know what to do, and have the capacity and willingness to do their part. All such are great factors and forces in making a business go and grow.—New Albany Tribune.

Too Small

Little Virginia had a habit of saying that she "smelled" any particular thing, she happened to desire. One day she went to visit her grandmother and learned there was candy in the house. So she said: "Grandma, I smell candy." Grandmother produced a piece, but its size did not please Virginia. "Well, Grandma," she said sorrowfully, "I wouldn't have thought I could smell such a little piece as this."

GUARANTEED to outwear your favorite TIRE

GUARANTEE
We guarantee this tire to outwear any other tire of equal price when run under the same conditions. Ask us for more particulars.

This tire was built—tested—rebuilt—improved and perfected. Then came a final test against the best standard tire of 13 leading makes.

An Amazing Result!

In every case the new Miller Geared-to-the-Road outlasted and outwore the competitive tire—and not one Miller carcass failed.

That means there is one tire that will outwear the rest. That is why you can now buy a tire backed by a real guarantee.

Available now in all popular sizes. Standard four-ply for ordinary service conditions; special six-ply heavy construction for use where service is unusually severe.

The Broken Vow

By H. IRVING KING

JAMES PENHALLOW, opening his small at the breakfast table, paused a letter in his hand and looked at his family with a troubled expression on his face. The family consisted, besides the head of the house, of Mrs. Penhallo, a placid woman of ample proportions, a tall son twenty-five, and several daughters, when they stood in a row, looked a flight of stairs.

"What is it, father?" chorused the girls.

"Aunt Pen is coming," replied Mr. Penhallo in a hushed voice.

A silence fell over the little assembly.

Something akin to consternation was visible on every face. They were secretly afraid of Aunt Penelope Penhallo. She was a tall, angular, elderly maiden lady possessed of amazing abilities which she cultivated by constant exercise.

Her visits were visitations, and whenever an announcement of her intended descent upon the peaceful family of her brother was made the effect was like that produced upon the Roman senate by the announcement that the emperor was at the gate of Rome.

"Dear me," at last the voice of Mrs. Penhallo broke the silence, "and I believe the guest chamber has been swept in a fortnight. When is she to arrive? Tonight? Girls—"

The disturbed matron began giving orders to her daughters regarding their dress and deportment during the stay of their revered aunt.

Miss Penelope Penhallo had fortune to leave to some chosen one of her brother's children the anxiety to placate the elderly spinster.

It easily had been accounted for, she hadn't. She ruled solely by word and habit. In the afternoon the old lady arrived.

"Well," she said, glancing around the dinner table, "I see we are all here. Jane, you are getting stouter."

"Never. You should diet. How the have grown—got to the seraggy when they are all elbows. Will I hope you are attending to your studies. Do you learn things any other than you used to? James, you are this place pretty well—though of course you can't afford it."

Having placed all the family at their places, the old lady proceeded to make early meal, criticising each dish as she disposed of it. William felt nervous and confided to the eldest of the girls that he would "be jiggered."

He would submit to being "bullied" by Aunt Pen. He made his first boast in a whisper of fear.

Next morning Aunt Pen, getting impatient by himself, asked abruptly: "Why aren't you married? You are enough now. I'll make a round of this today and pick out a wife for you."

"My dear Aunt Pen," began William. "In a matter of this kind I—"

There, there, that will do," interrupted Aunt Pen, "don't argue. Run now, I want to talk to your father."

James—as Mr. Penhallo was called—went to the room—"why on earth don't you marry?" William fled and left his father's fate.

Mrs. Penhallo was waiting for an old oak tree under which the rippling brook, the two accustomed to meet and, seated on mossy bank, discuss "cabbages and kings," love and housekeeping. But that they might have done all in the judge's parlor—but the big oak was so much more romantic.

"What do you think?" said William. He took his seat beside Laura.

Aunt Pen has arrived and is going to devote the day to picking out a suitable wife for me. Isn't it funny?"

"Laughed heartily; but Laura looked perturbed."

"If she does," said the fair, young man slowly, "I am afraid that you—you are all so dreadfully afraid of Aunt Pen that you might be—"

"Sensational!" cried William. "What nonsense. Laura, hear me: I swear it is you and you only that I am going to marry. I don't care a hang for Aunt Pen. I swear that I will not marry her. Is that enough?"

"You dear boy," replied Laura. "You were late in the afternoon when Aunt Pen, having made a round of visits in her brother's commandeer, returned to the country houses in the neighborhood, returned to the Penhallo place. William, who had been on errand just after his aunt who told him in the hall with: 'I've found a suitable wife for you, William. I brought her over to dinner. She is in the library now. Go in and see her.'"

The old lady whisked upstairs, leaving William flushed with anger. He was realizing what he was about her realizing the library. A tall, young man was standing by the table.

"Laura," he cried. "Aunt Pen said she's the faintest idea that we were engaged. But, of course, now we can't be married."

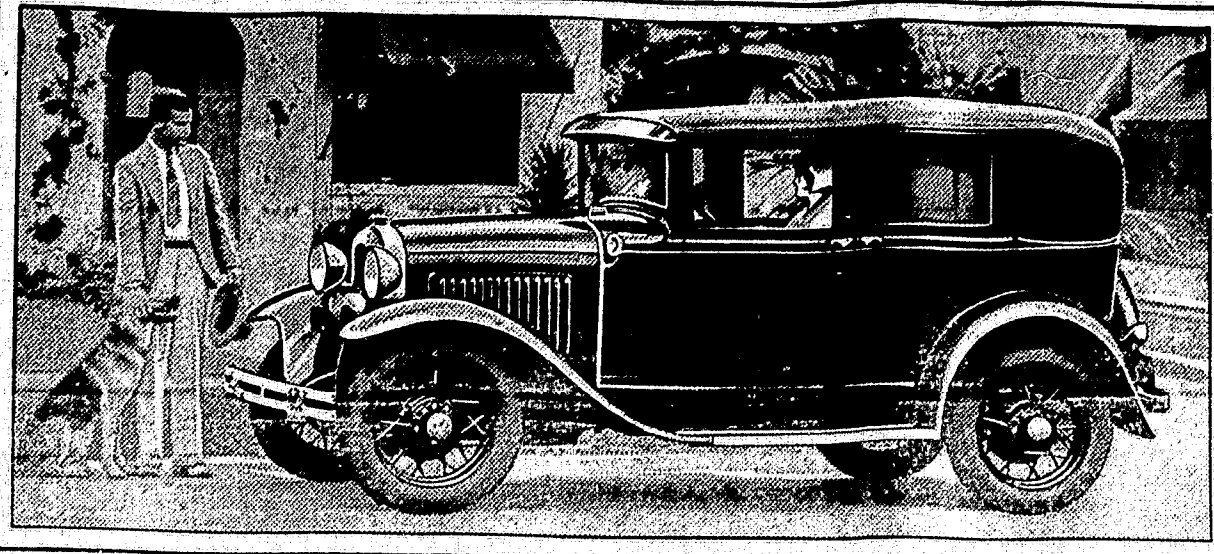

"Why not?" asked William. "Why didn't you swear that, under circumstances, would you marry Aunt Pen picked out for you?"

"Oh, forget it!" cried William. "Aunt Pen is out of this entirely."

Ford Offers New De Luxe Sedan

Ford De Luxe Sedan

THE De Luxe Sedan, recently added to the Ford line, is designed for those who desire distinctiveness and unusual comfort in an automobile. The interior is inviting and roomy with wide doors to both compartments. Absence of rear quarter windows gives the car a striking individuality and affords privacy to the occupants.

Interior trimmings and appointments are luxurious. Upholstery is either in brown mohair or a deep tan Bedford cord patterned after that used in high-priced cars.

Other refinements include arm rests for the rear seat, mahogany finished garnish moldings on the windows and beneath the windshield, flexible robe rail and hardware in an attractive pattern.

The front seat is adjustable within a range of four inches to suit the convenience and comfort of the driver. It is moved quickly and easily by a small, inconspicuous handle in the front center of the seat just above the floor.

The De Luxe Sedan, like other Ford body types, can be obtained in any one of several color combinations.

Grumbler Throws Away

Chance of Happiness

May we be spared from the grumbler. . . . And yet, if we would change his grumble into pleasure, we must exert a little patience of our own.

Getting impatient and disdainful and short-tempered with him is likely to make him worse. And, after all, it isn't very hard to help these rather trying people along the road of life.

The grumbler folk don't have a very easy time. Of course, they can be a positive nuisance to you. But just think what a real nuisance they are to themselves. To have always a spirit of grumbling in one's mind must be a load, the weight of which Pilgrim could never have imagined.

In many ways the grumbler's burden is worse than Pilgrim's. You see, there was always a chance of his getting rid of it. He had got into some bad habits, but grumbling was not one of them.

Once you start grumbling, the worst part of your mind will seize upon it, practice upon it, develop it, until you are in the nasty, almost unbreakable meshes of it. Soon it will choke every bit of happiness out of you. Resist grumbling always. Its power cannot grow if you do that.—London Tit Bits.

Rainfall Real Event in

Parts of South America

Many people, if asked what was the driest place in the world, would plump for Central Australia, where rain fell last year after a drought that had lasted for seven years. They would be wrong, says an English paper, for there are some parts of South America where a seven years' drought is nothing, and a man can live out the Psalmist's "three score and ten" without ever seeing a drop of rain.

Of course, it may rain sometimes. Lord Ernest Hamilton has described the coming of rain in Lima, the capital of Peru, during a visit he paid there.

"We were fortunate enough to be favored with the only shower which Lima had enjoyed for seventy years," he wrote. In his book "Forty Years On," "For five minutes it rained solid tropical rain. The terror-stricken inhabitants thought the end of the world had come." But if America can boast of some of the driest places in the world, it also contains some of the wettest. Graydon, in Nicaragua, has had as much as 297 inches of rain in a single year.

I never saw Spanish

The moribund are not, as Spanish proverb has it, giving the natu impression that Spain was the son of the very last gens. In point of fact there are no general names in the Spanish peninsula, and there are no rivers. But there were great quantities of minerals kept as ornaments of tinklers by the natives of Peru at the time of the Spanish conquest, in like almost everything else of value there, they soon found their way into the hands of the Spanish

Most Valuable Pottery

Peachblow ware is the most valuable of Chinese pottery. It belongs to the Chinese, pottery, which are translucent glazes embracing a type of flame color. These glazes differ from red to a delicate pink, which is peachblow.

Peachblow products have realized prize amounts in salesrooms, and many of these pieces are exhibited in museums. They are no longer made. Originally peachblow was made in King-tse-shan and was considered as a perfect example of the pottery art.

CHAPTER X.—Bettington, a man of great energy and ambition, had been working for a number of years in the office of a prominent business man in New York. He was a man of great energy and ambition, but his lack of success in his career had made him a man of great bitterness and despair.

Mary tried in vain to stem this torrent of tears. "She must have loved him, after all," thought the girl. She was not to know how much of relief was mixed in this seeming grief. After all these years Evelyn Radway found herself free. No more need she fear all those subtle cruelties with which he had so often amused himself, or look forward to succeeding years with dread.

"You must send your parents a wireless," she said when she was more composed, "but I can't spare you Mary. You must not leave me when we get ashore. I have had very few loyal friends in my life and I need some now."

On deck Captain Hallett was already asserting himself. He stopped squarely before Bettington, who was pacing up and down.

"A word with you," he said peremptorily. "I command this ship, and I'll have no plotting or insubordination."

"Quite right," said Bettington mildly. "I was talking to Mrs. Radway awhile back, and I said that you and your pal, the steward, were two of a kind."

"I am always sure of a kindly pat on the back from you," Bettington answered. "It was not so easy to return meek answers to a man of Hallett's type. I had an idea you men of the sea were bluff, hearty sort of fellows, and yet you tell me you have been saying things to Mrs. Radway which were unwarrantable. . . . It is that your 'nervous' way of giving a man a square deal?"

"My nature lead for square men is my motto," Hallett retorted. "I say what I mean and I mean what I say. I don't like you."

How impossible it seemed to be able to make a confident and ally of such an incoherent and silly man. Hallett crossed to the wireless house there must be some sort of trouble in the man, he put his arms about the shoulders of his captive and gave him a friendly pat on the head.

"The fact is," Bettington muttered, "these things are the only ones about to guard the women if there's trouble; he makes it very hard for me."

other is known as Matzger." "Impossible," Bettington asserted. "What about Hallett and the others?" "You have heard the death rattle in his throat. As to the others, what are they but boys? There will be no trouble at all. I think I can prevail upon Mrs. Radway to see what is best to be done. I count on your influence with her. Naturally Hallett has tried to influence her and most likely something of what he has said has made her uneasy. She will realize that her position aboard is different now. Radway was the conventional protection and now he is removed. Inevitably, she will become more reserved, but that will not mean she has ceased to have confidence in you."

Bettington experienced keen pleasure in this comforting thought. It was quite probable that she would feel as Clements said.

"What do you want me to do?" he demanded. "This is my plan," said Clements. "I want her assurance that the money will be paid. If she agrees to do this without consulting lawyers or friends, I shall let that fool of a captain run the Albatross into the East river and rant and dictate as he chooses. I shall attend to him at my leisure. She will refuse at first; she will certainly want to consult some one. Women always do. I shall forbid her to tell Hallett. He would never allow it on a ship, he commanded. He couldn't. He's the obstinate, honest sort, who would meet death for a principle and think he was dying for principle. She will talk to you."

"And she'll find me backing you up very strongly." What was a million dollars compared with the immunity it bought!

"I am going to see her now," Clements rose without any appearance of haste. "It may be she will call you in while I am there. You will be indignant, angry, threatening, until I point out the strength of my position. Then you will see light."

What a damnable situation to be in! Bettington was a man who detested deceit and now he was committed to the practice of it in order to safeguard the woman for whom he cared. He wondered if he could explain that his actions were dictated solely in the interests of Mrs. Radway and his friend's daughter. Hallett's unfortunate enmity, which had infected the wireless operator and Bob, would make any effort to explain the real situation impossible. Hallett would scent a plot, shout loudly enough for some of the crew to hear of his opinions, and Bettington would lose his usefulness.

Captain Hallett read the burial services for the se who die at sea and Mrs. Radway beheld all that was mortal of her tyrant sink into the green water. All hands were mustered to the last rites and she saw, for the first time, to what men the Albatross was entrusted. There was a ravening look about these creatures gathered together by the steward; they seemed to be of the crew who had been in mortal combat with another ship. She was collected when the captain dismissed them to their stations.

"Mary," she said kindly, "run away and talk to your wireless boy; I want to be alone."

She wondered how she would order her life now that there would be none to coerce her. She no longer wanted the care of great houses or the order of splendid entertainments or the ritual of the sea. She had none left. Mary Unwin should live with her and she married Crosby Todd she would so that the girl never wanted, as she suspected the parents had. To make a happy life; that was the most pleasant task of all. Resolutely she banished all thoughts of Bettington from her mind. Later, she hoped, he would call upon her. She needed new friends and the water outlook they might bring.

Her train of thought was broken by Clements. "I want a few minutes' talk with you, madam," he began. She hesitated a little. She was in no mood for business. She supposed it was something to do with the catering. This was a department over which her late husband had exercised his own supervision.

"Tomorrow morning," she told him. "I am not feeling very well today." "I fear that will be too late," he answered. She had a premonition that what he wanted to say must be of great importance. But she did not let him know that his presence had a comforting effect upon her as though some mellow influence had fastened upon her heart.

"What is it?" she asked. He looked around him. There were several people on deck. Bob Unwin, his sister and Crosby were grouped together. Hallett was polishing brasses near the bridge; Hallett was in the radio room and a deckhand, named Mike, at the wheel. "I must not run the risk of being interrupted," he said gravely. "I suggest the library, madam, if you will permit it."

When she had taken a seat below and had told Clements to sit, she asked him for what reason he needed privacy.

A NEW STAR AT LAKEWOOD

There was a delightful surprise provided by The Lakewood Players last Monday when Hugh O'Connell, a star comedian popular in New York played leading role in "Little Accident". His performance of Norman Overbeck was perfect. With deft touches and pointed lines he kept the audience in happy mood, when not in roars of laughter. Mr. O'Connell was ably supported by Peg Entwistle, Thurston Hall, Kathryn Keys, Robert Hudson, Frances Goodrich, Samuel T. Godfrey, Beatrice Terry, Virginia Godfrey, and others. Miss Robin Simpson, whose appearance at Lakewood was recently interfered with by illness, also made her first appearance at Lakewood and gave graphic portrayal of a little slaver.

It is easy to understand why "Little Accident" was such a phenomenal success, for it has abundant fine qualities which are brought out by the Lakewood Players. It is the story of the predicament of a young man about to be married who finds he is the father of a child. As with all genuine comedy there is underlying serious motivation. In this case it is the filial devotion of the father to the child and his determination that it shall have a good home and proper care. The efforts of the bachelors to care for the child provides a series of laugh provoking situations. For next week, beginning Monday, June 30th, with a special matinee on Friday, July 4th, The Lakewood Players will be seen in a hilarious comedy "Just Married". The story is of the happenings between two youngsters who have just gone under the yoke of Hymen and how they run into misunderstandings and difficulties and finally straighten everything out, affords an evening of undiluted delight. The play was selected because it gives the new comedian star Hugh O'Connell an opportunity to entertain to the top of his bent. Interest will be shown in the fact that Dorothy Stickney will make her first appearance for the season in "Just Married".
